Comprehension:

Some people use the terms 'comic book' and 'graphic novel' interchangeably, but critics and scholars are in general agreement that the two text types are not the same. A comic book tends to be part of a longer series and is usually structured sequentially around a simple storyline. A graphic novel usually involves a more complex plot structure, often divided into chapters, with deeper themes. Graphic novels include many of the same elements you would find in a traditional novel: characterization, foreshadowing, symbolism, allusions and so on; it's just that a graphic novel takes you on a visual journey through the story rather than leaving everything to your imagination.

Comprehension:

One can characterise preschool / infant pedagogy as an invisible pedagogy. In terms of the concept of classification and frame, this pedagogy is realised through weak classification and weak frames. Visible pedagogies are realised through strong classification and strong frames. The basic difference between visible and invisible pedagogies is in the manner in which criteria are transmitted and in the degree of specificity of the criteria. The more implicit the manner of transmission and the more diffuse the criteria, the more invisible the pedagogy; the more specific the criteria, the more explicit the manner of their transmission, the more visible the pedagogy. If the pedagogy is invisible, what aspects of the child have high visibility for the teacher? I suggest two aspects. The first arises out of an inference the teacher makes from the child's ongoing behaviour about the developmental stage of the child. This inference is then referred to as concept of readiness. The second aspect of the child refers to his external behaviour and is conceptualised by the teacher as busyness. The child should be busy doing things. These inner (readiness) and outer (busyness) aspects of the child can be transformed into one concept of 'ready to do.' The teacher infers from the 'doing' the state of 'readiness' of the child as it is revealed in his present activity and as this state adumbrates future 'doing'.

The second aspect of the child refers to his external behaviour and is conceptualised by the teacher as busyness. The child should be busy doing things. These inner (readiness) and outer (busyness) aspects of the child can be transformed into one concept of 'ready to do.' The teacher infers from the 'doing' the state of 'readiness' of the child as it is revealed in his present activity and as this state adumbrates future 'doing'.

Read the paragraph and answer the question given below:

Transactional Leaders are those who guide or motivate their followers in the direction of established goals by clarifying role and task requirements. But there's another type of leader who inspires followers to transcend their own self-interests for the good of the organization and who is capable of having a profound and extraordinary effect on his or her followers. These are Transformational Leaders. Transactional and transformational leadership shouldn't be viewed as opposing approaches to getting things done. Transformational leadership is built on top of transactional leadership. Transformational leadership produces levels of employee effort and performance that go beyond what would occur with a transactional approach alone. Moreover, transformational leadership is more than charisma since the transformational leadership attempts to instill in followers the ability to question not only established views but also views held by the leader. The evidence supporting superiority of Transformational Leadership over transactional is overwhelmingly impressive. For instance, the studies looked at managers in different settings, including military and the business found that the transformational leaders were evaluated as more effective, higher performers, and more promotable than their transactional counterparts. In addition, evidence indicates that Transformational Leadership is strongly correlated with lower turnover rates, higher productivity and higher employee satisfaction.
