Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow:

Former Professor of Philosophy at Michigan University, and father of eco-philosophy, Henryk Skolimowski, roused our consciousness to become aware of the deadly consequences of using toxic pesticides and gave people a constructive message of alternative living. His eco-philosophy reinvents our relationship with nature and self. The proposed solutions are not utopian, but truly practical.

For Skolimowski ecological phenomena are of cosmic nature and all life has evolved from one, basic, cosmic phenomenon. Existence of any one species cannot be isolated from all other species. Therefore, Homo sapiens, as a species, is not isolated from other forms of life. All forms are enveloped in oneness. Skolimowski had faith in the absolute unity of all life and the universe.

Destruction of habitats, extinction of species, violence against certain forms of life, the numerous divisions and conflicts amongst people, our discriminatory attitude and the tendency to isolate life from non-life and living from non-living — all of these are due to disregarding the principle of oneness. Skolimowski connects diversity with unity and emphasises the oneness of all life.

Eco-philosophy seeks to refine and adopt an art of living in sync with the environment, promoting ethical living.

Skolimowskian philosophy teaches us to comply with the laws of evolution. Defiance of evolution reduces us, and diffuses our creative potential. If socio-cultural and political institutions like families, religions and governments are not conscious enough and are not evolutionary in nature, those being nurtured in the shadows of these systems remain intellectual dwarfs. If the educational system is flawed with its commoditisation and is directed at training individuals and communities to become producers and consumers rather than becoming enlightened citizens, then, the ‘educated’ are left with reduced intellect. But, if socio-cultural, political and educational systems are vibrant with positive, life-enhancing ideas compliance with cosmic evolution will be fulfilled.

निम्नलिखित गद्यांश को पढ़कर पूछे गए प्रश्नों के उत्तर लिखिए।

कौन नहीं चाहता कि उन्हें ज्यादा से ज्यादा लोग जानें। पर इसकी जो कीमत चुकानी होती है, उसके लिए कम ही लोग तैयार होते हैं। आप चर्चित हैं, तो आपकी सामाजिक जवाबदेही भी अधिक होती है। हर अनुकूल-प्रतिकूल स्थिति के लिए आपको बाकी लोगों से ज्यादा तैयारी करनी पड़ती है। चर्चित होने के बाद खुद के मुताबिक सामान्य जीवन जीना और भी कठिन होता है। चर्चित लोगों से अनौपचारिक बात करें, तो पाएंगे की ऐसे में वे जो बता रहे हैं, उससे वह अलग है, जो उन्होंने औपचारिक बातचीत के दौरान कही थी। चर्चित व्यक्तियों की बनी छवि प्रायः सच्चाई से अलग होती है। विडंबना यह है कि वे खुद भी उसी छवि को जीने में लग जाते हैं, जो गढ़ी गई है। अलबर्ट आइंस्टाइन ने, जिन्हें लोग सुपर मानव कहते हैं और जो जीवन-काल में ही इस दुनिया के सर्वाधिक लोकप्रिय व्यक्ति थे, एक बार कहा था कि मेरी उपलब्धियों व क्षमताओं के बीच, जो लोगों द्वारा समझी गई है और वास्तव में जो मैं हूँ, एक विरोधाभास है। लोकप्रियता के सामाजिक-नैतिक पहलु पर अध्ययन करने वाले मनोविज्ञानी कहते हैं - टिकाऊ लोकप्रियता सही मायने में वही है, जो दिलों पर राज करवाए, न कि चर्चाओं में। चर्चा में होना सरल है, पर इसकी प्रक्रिया है जटिल। इसीलिए लोकप्रिय व्यक्ति प्रायः बदनाम भी जल्दी होता है। उसके नकारात्मक पहलु भी जल्द सामने आते हैं। उन पर अहं भी जल्दी तारी हो जाता है। ऐसी लोकप्रियता अक्सर यह भ्रम देती है कि आप सामान्य से अलग हैं। यह सोच अपनों व दूसरों से बहुत दूर ले जाती है। इसे संतुलित तरीके से न लिया जाये, तो ज्यादातर चर्चित व्यक्तियों के लिए यह दुखी करने वाली होती है। अंततः यह बात याद रखें कि प्रसिद्ध लोगों को गुमनामी का सामना करना और खुद को नैतिक बनाए रखना आना चाहिए। अन्यथा वक्त की हवा के बीच वे तिनके की तरह उड़ा दिए जाएंगे।

Read the following passage and answer questions.

Near the end of the 19th century, economist Thorstein Veblen came up with the idea of conspicuous consumption. Coincidentally (or maybe not), around this time French perfumers mastered the art of selling an inexpensively-produced product as a symbol of decadent luxury. In fact, historian Eugénie Briot points out that the marketing of scents through clever branding, rather than real differences in what's being sold, originated in 19th-century France.

Industrialisation transformed the perfume business in the 19th century. Steam engines allowed for mass production on a radically new scale. Between 1880 and 1905, one factory went from a 6-horsepower machine to a 500-horsepower alternative. Machines ground iris root and extracted and infused scents. Factories could now dry perfumed soaps in less than a tenth of the time it had previously taken.

In the 1870s, French perfumers also quietly began swapping flowers and other organic materials out for artificial compounds. Scents created with piperonal, a synthetic chemical that happened to smell like the heliotrope flower, quickly became popular with the upper classes. But, as the cost of producing the chemical fell, "heliotrope" perfumes descended the class ladder. By the late 1890s, it was associated with disreputable members of the lower class. The price of other scent compounds, including vanillin and artificial musk, also dropped precipitously in these years.

Some perfumers celebrated the newly widespread availability of perfumes. "One of the outstanding features of the social history of our time is the ascent of the humble classes toward well-being, a luxury, as we could say, until then reserved only to the privileged," one wrote. "Today, the humblest craftsman uses perfumed soap, which he or she can obtain at infinitesimal prices."

While some perfume-makers gravitated toward a high-volume, low-price business, others developed ways to keep selling at high prices. The different perfumes were "easily interchangeable," Briot writes, so manufacturers found new ways to sell them.

It helped that in the second half of the century, perfumers also achieved a new social status. Some were knighted, and others were elected to public office. This fame allowed some of them to transform their names into brands. As competition heated up, Briot writes, "Capitalising on their names was among the first, and best, ways to achieve dominance."

Other tactics for selling expensive perfumes to wealthy buyers included displaying them in fancy boutiques and using elaborate packaging. And in a move echoed today in "sponsored content" stories on news sites, high-end perfumers also placed ads disguised as society gossip columns in which high-society ladies praised their products. As Briot puts it, perfumers differentiated "their products by conferring a highly symbolic value on them."

Read the following passage and answer questions.

In the early- to mid-19th century, Americans heard or ignored ‘sounds’ depending on their ideological predispositions, and perhaps to some extent we still do. After all, this summer many of us will head out for a week of camping in the woods or hiding out in a beachside cabin, eager for the peace and quiet of nature. But why do we think of nature as quiet, when there are squawking birds, crashing waves, and maybe a raucous thunderstorm rolling in? Environmental historian Peter A. Coates points out that what we think of as noise is as much a matter of ideology as decibels.

Coates writes that city dwellers have always complained about noise, starting long before industrialisation. “Possessing the power to drive genteel folks to distraction were hammering tinsmiths, carpet-beating maids, whip-cracking, foul-mouthed animal drovers, and, not least, the purveyors of so-called ‘rough music,’” he writes. Horse-drawn carriages made such a racket on city cobblestones that people in the 1890s actually looked forward to the horseless electric carriage as a quieter alternative.

But in some times and places, it was nature that was understood as noisy while the sounds of civilised society were considered a gentle comfort. Quoting historian Mark Smith, Coates notes that European settlers in America found the noise of an axe striking a tree an “aural victory over howling wilderness”—“howling” evoking Old Testament language suggesting both wild beasts and “equally blood-thirsty and ignoble human savages whose keynote sound was a blood-curdling war whoop.”

To 19th-century modernists, Coates writes, “mechanical sounds and the noisy bustle of commerce bespoke prosperity” while quiet “was synonymous with indolence, backwardness, and stagnation.” But romantics like Nathaniel Hawthorne heard the “long shriek” of a distant train whistle as an affront to both the natural sounds of birds and leaves and the preindustrial human sounds of the village clock or the cowbell. “It tells a story of busy men, citizens, from the hot streets,” Hawthorne wrote. “It brings the noisy world into the midst of our slumberous peace.”

In the 20th century, natural quiet—or, rather, the absence of radios and car horns and the presence of honking geese and howling wolves—became central to the conservation movement and the creation of natural parks. One founder of the Wilderness Society suggested in 1932 that designated wild areas would “interest the folks in the inexpensive joys of nature in lieu of the jarring jams of jazz.”

In contrast, “wise use” advocates of the late 20th century hoped human sounds could coexist harmoniously with nature. In 1990, future Interior Secretary Gale Norton argued for the “right to make noise”—for example by enjoying the natural world from the seat of a snowmobile.

When city-dwellers head out into nature this summer, they might just find that the quiet they seek is not external after all.

Read the following passage and answer questions.

On the popular Twitter hashtag #notalion, medieval historians and aficionados share the most un-leonine lions from the Middle Ages. One on the edge of an illuminated manuscript smiles gently, its flat face almost human; another from the 11th century seems to smirk with pride at the glory of his mane that radiates like the sun.

Why do these lions look, well, not like lions? In early Christian and Romanesque sculpture, “the physiognomy of the lion gradually loses more and more of its animal aspect, and tends, though quaintly, to the human.” The obvious explanation is that there weren’t that many lions in medieval Europe to model for artists, and the accessible representations for copying had the same lack of realism.

However, an art historian points out, there actually were a number of lions on the continent, imported from Africa and Asia: There are many accounts of their presence and even their breeding, first at various courts and then in the cities; they were kept in Rome by the popes as early as 1100. The city of Florence had lions in the 13th century; lions were at Ghent’s court in the 15th century. So, it’s not impossible that first-hand accounts of lions were available to artists – an artist made a drawing of a lion ‘al vif’ [‘from life’] in the 13th century – though where he saw the animal is unknown.

The inaccuracy of medieval lions may have been a stylistic preference, particularly in a bestiary, or compendium of beasts. Because the artists chose to illustrate the animals rather than their accompanying moralisations, they had more freedom of choice in their imagery. For example, the picture in the 12th or 13th-century Ashmole Bestiary, in which a big lion is depicted as cowering in terror at a rooster, relates this supposed cowardly attribute of the lion!

Lions were also prevalent on medieval door knockers, where they were represented as stern guardians. They regularly appeared on the heraldry of European royalty, their predatory poses symbolising authority and a noble independence. There was likely some hearsay involved in the imperfect medieval lions, yet the artists were often breaking with nature to express an idea. Rather than mistakes, these #notalion specimens can be viewed as artistic decisions, albeit ones which appear delightfully strange to our modern eyes.

What is the passage about?

Options :

The popular Twitter hashtag #notalion and its sharing of medieval lions, which are abnormal, anthropoid and are strange not only to the modern eye but to the artists of that time too.

The portrayal of lions in medieval Europe in unreal terms is to be seen as a stylistic preference and an expression of artistic freedom, and to be traced to the absence of lions then.

Europe had real lions during the middle ages as models for their drawings, yet artists' medieval lions are not leonine enough, but this could not be an expression of values associated with them by artists.

While illustrations of medieval lions are strange, their oddity being not traceable to the absence of lions, and are ineffable as other representations have normal expressions, they could be expressions of artists' values.

What does the author imply by the following sentence from the passage?

In early Christian and Romanesque sculpture, "the physiognomy of the lion gradually loses more and more of its animal aspect, and tends, though quaintly, to the human."

Options :

Early Christians humanised animals to nullify any remnant of pagan influences.

Romanesque sculpture was highly imaginative and had 'Man as the measure of all'.

There need not be or cannot be any logical explanation for the stated fact.

While the evidence is empirical, the reasons for such representations require conjectures and rationalisations.

Read the following passage and answer questions.

Readers of adventure stories such ‘Treasure Island’ or ‘Sherlock Holmes’ might remember how the seemingly harmless “black spot,” a mere scrap of paper, or an envelope of just five orange pips, were a palpable source of fear for those who knew the code of the secret society who used them. Being singled out, or “marked for death” in this way, rather than an obscure joke, was nothing less than a threat for those who understood the symbol. Language can encode many more nuances than just literal meanings or grammatical functions, even when it comes to humble punctuation, secret languages or the register of a particular subculture.

Interestingly, even in ordinary, everyday language use, the very words and expressions we use are already marked for our cultural and social biases, so much so that we’re often not even aware of it. It reveals our underlying assumptions about what we may consider normal, default, regular—even positive or desirable in certain contexts. This has an impact on how we view their opposites—the abnormal, unusual, irregular, negative, undesirable. Take a pair of simple antonyms, such as happy/unhappy. The word “happy” is considered more of a default, normal, perhaps more desirable state in English, while “unhappy” is considered more “marked,” and we know this because it’s actively morphologically marked with a prefix – un.

This idea, known as markedness, is a concept that is applied from linguistics to psychology, cognitive science and sociology; the concept is particularly useful for describing certain contrasts and constructs. To put it very simply, the insight into markedness is this: in a contrasting pair, you might expect an equal binary relationship, but you’ll often find that the relationship is not equal, it’s asymmetric. One is usually considered generic (the unmarked) and in many cases, is a default state favored above the other (the marked).

Unmarked words in English are often favored as more positive, such as in happy/sad, friendly/unfriendly, clean/unclean or dirty, even when there may be no overt morphological marking. Researchers have noted how pairs like man/woman, while considered politically or socially equal, linguistically are unequal, not just because “woman” is marked, but because “man” can still be understood as a generic for the human race while “woman” is never used in that way.

It’s revealing how we mark these words in common expressions that are not even politically charged at all, like “she’s four feet tall”!

Read the passage given below and answer questions.

Nationalism and national identity are not just ideological constructs. Rather, they are created and enforced through a bureaucracy that produces censuses, surveys and identity documents. This bureaucracy and its technologies of surveillance (photography, fingerprinting, statistics) are very recent, but they have become an indelible part of our lives. Holding a passport is a sign of citizenship or legal residency recognised by any other sovereign state in the world.

But even before modern states could attempt to control the movement of their populations, people weren't free to move around as they pleased. For most of history, large segments of the population, including serfs, slaves, and indentured servants, required privately created passes or papers to legitimate their movement. But as the global economy expanded, and New World frontiers and early industrial factories developed an insatiable demand for labor, these private controls fell away. The European empires of the late 19th century imposed new rights, responsibilities, and identities on their citizens through education, conscription, and taxation. The prevailing liberalism, the vagueness of nationality in an imperial context, and the limits of surveillance meant millions upon millions were able to move to settler colonies in the Americas, South Africa and Oceania—with often the notable exclusion of Asians.

This diplomatic-surveillance regime changed after WWI. Nation-states claiming to represent exclusive nationalities replaced empires. The rise of communist parties in Russia and elsewhere in Europe gave rise to suspicion of foreign agents. Moreover, the demand for labor was easing. National working classes constituted political interest groups that protested the labor competition of new immigrant classes.

With the hardening of border security and immigration quotas between these new nation states, and the spread of cheap photography, passports became both standardised, mandatory travel documents and ritual tools reinforcing national identity. Indeed, holders of passports from more powerful nations enjoy privileges abroad that others do not. Meanwhile, many of the fragments of empires that failed to form nation states, or unwanted minority groups, have at times been made “stateless” populations. These groups have ranged from Russian expatriates after the Bolshevik Revolution, to European Jews during the Holocaust and Palestinian refugees after the creation of Israel. Lacking a passport in a worldwide system of nation states is the ultimate negation of agency.

But national identity doesn't even mean all that it used to. Much of the new nationalism expressed as xenophobia and racism is rooted in nostalgia, accurate or not, for a time when national membership meant certain shared experiences and rights bridging social classes. The march of de-industrialisation, the decline of welfare services and the widening of income inequality mean that the global elite are everywhere carving out private zones of privilege guarded by fences and private security. The value of a passport as diplomatic currency is losing ground to another currency—the almighty dollar.

Single Line Question Option : No Option Orientation : Vertical

Correct : 1 Wrong : 0.25

Identify the option that sums up the ideas and views expressed in the passage correctly and fully:

Options :

✓ Passports reify national identities; they helped surveil people and their movements but now control their migration and travel; they can be used to offer or deny exclusive privileges of citizenships which themselves can now be bought.

✗ A passport means you are the citizen of a world; like passes and permits, it enables the state to check and monitor your movement. Passports have become common and are obligatory tokens of identity.

✗ Tracing the origins of passports and understanding the changes geopolitics experienced would show that passports offer privileges which become noticeable only when one is denied a passport.

✗ Empires and nations of the world have always kept an eye on the movements of their people – the Indian toll-gates prove that. A passport helps them do this systematically.

Question Number : 142 Question Id : 7230531073 Question Type : MCQ Option Shuffling : Yes Display Question Number : Yes
Single Line Question Option : No Option Orientation : Vertical

Correct : 1 Wrong : 0.25

Identify the main idea discussed in the fourth paragraph.

Options :

✗ There is a class division in passports themselves – a Bangladeshi passport and a Swedish one are not 'equal' in their diplomatic reach and influence.

✗ Passports opens many a door and provides many an opportunity; lack of a passport closes all such doors and deny one all opportunities.

Passports and national identities are intertwined, so the absence of one will mean the absence of the other.

In the present world, passports are mandatory, and they help establish national identity; 'stateless' and 'powerless' human beings can be empowered with a passport.

Read the passage below and answer Questions.

Children's books may not form part of the recruitment process for most businesses, but for shoe repair and key-cutting business Timpson, the key to its hiring process is whether the prospective candidate resembles say, Mr Happy or Miss Quick, characters in children's books. "Other than specialist roles in finance or IT, we really don't bother about CVs or qualifications and we certainly don't take much notice of the words written on an application form," Timpson says. "The only thing that matters is personality."

As well as more unorthodox methods, firms are turning to AI and other forms of tech to recruit. L'Oreal has introduced virtual reality to its approach, whereby graduates don a headset, take a virtual tour of the French beauty giant's offices, and experience a virtual meeting while having their personality and judgement assessed. Byte London, a marketing technology agency, recently introduced a chatbot (a computer programme that conducts a conversation) to help find employees. Replacing the initial application process, the Facebook Messenger chatbot, named Space Gentleman, asks applicants a series of 10 questions such as: "Do you have the right to work in the UK?", "We wanted to reduce the cost of hiring candidates, improve the quality of candidates applying to Byte and make the application more enjoyable." He adds: "We're also using it as a soft sell for the agency's personality, helping people work out if they'd be a good fit."

Last year, the mini bakery store chain Bagelman ditched the CV as part of the recruitment process, instead encouraging prospective staff to attend a recruitment workshop, where the company could identify people who matched the job. "We were hiring individuals who looked great on paper with impressive qualifications, but it soon became apparent they didn't share our values. We realised that no matter the qualifications on the CV, it was the person in front of us that mattered." Now Bagelman runs workshops where candidates have to participate in various set tasks. "Candidates who stand out for us will show great customer service, the ability to think on their feet and retain information. A CV can't show us any of that and is open to interpretation."

Chris Rowley, a professor at Cass Business School, says companies should be more creative with recruiting but warns that while some methods can reduce the problems with CVs and applications forms, which he says have "poor reliability as predictors of job performance", you need to be able to justify that decisions are not based on characteristics such as gender, ethnicity or age, but on the job criteria. He advises companies use a mix of CVs, application forms, and semi-structured interviews and tests.

What is the main idea that the passage develops?

Options :

As times are changing, and as CVs and applications do not give a clue to the actual skills of applicants, modern business firms are successfully using novel recruiting methods.

Companies are doing everything to recruit a good employee, using children's literature, virtual reality, chatbots and even workshops. CVs and letters of application are not to be trusted.

Small business networks have intelligently started adopting advances in technology to recruit people; admittedly, CVs and applications have poor reliability, but they need not be done away with.

Personality and on-the-job-performance are more important than academic qualifications and so smart business networks use smart techniques and modern methods to recruit.

Which ONE of the following options is a proper thesis-statement, fit to be developed into an argumentative essay?

Options :

✖ 'The Great Gatsby' is a great novel.

✖ Though critics point out that Scott Fitzgerald's 'The Great Gatsby' is about how the notion of the American dream is illusory, or how it portrays the loss of innocence, or portrays the Jazz Age, its true fame lies in capturing the shadows of evil yet to come.

✔ 'The Great Gatsby', of course, conveys the message that the notion of the American dream is illusory, but more importantly it ushers American fiction into a new narrative world, as evident in T. S. Eliot's observation: 'the first step that American fiction has taken since Henry James'.

✖ 'The Great Gatsby', though it conveys the message that the notion of the American dream is illusory, does not argue that Americans must stop dreaming.

Options :

✖ Exemplify, even in a text that deals with a technical issue, ideas; the examples should match schemata that audience have interest in and easily relate to the discussed idea.

✔ Make sure your adjectives and determiners are specific to the idea; make doubly sure the adjectives are derived ones and attributive in nature; condense sentences with many 'technical adjectives'.

✖ Employ sentences that are not too long or dense; be economical with words; define jargon only where needed – defining a term which your audience is familiar with is either insulting to them or challenging to them.

✖ Introduce not only the essay but also each paragraph in a multi-paragraph essay, but make sure the introductions act as advance organisers.

- Films will continue to entice adult-addicts for their love of the medium and insecure teenagers who have been hypnotised by the glamour, who dream of the money they would earn and the glamorous lifestyle of those associated with it.

Teachers of 'Writing' would advise you to use the second sentence (or similar structures). Identify the option that properly explains the reasons for such a preference:

Options :

- ☐ The second sentence moves down from 'adults' to 'teenagers', it follows the right hierarchical order and reflects reality better.
- ☐ Mercenary instincts alone cannot be the reason, and since personalised satisfaction is more important, the second sentence has the better sequence.
- ☐ Love for medium is more important than glamour. The second sentence gets the order right.
- ☒ Since the coordinated parts move from the shorter to the longer in the second sentence, a rhythmically more attractive line is created in the second sentence.

The sentences of a paragraph are given in a jumbled order and labelled A, B, C, D, E and F below. One of the sentences offers a digression. Identify the digressing sentence:

- A. Indian Buddhist analysis of the mind spans a period of some 15 centuries, from the earliest discourses of the Buddha to the systematic developments of late Mahāyāna Buddhism.
- B. Perhaps no other classical philosophical tradition, East or West, offers a more complex and counter-intuitive account of mind and mental phenomena than Buddhism.
- C. Philosophical accounts of mind emerge within scholastic traditions but tracing their roots necessarily uniquely to Buddha's teachings of the not-self doctrine is fanciful.
- D. Rather, Buddhist theories of mind center on the doctrine of not-self, which postulates that human beings are reducible to the physical and psychological constituents and processes which comprise them.

While Buddhists share with other Indian philosophers the view that the domain of the mental encompasses a set of interrelated faculties and processes, they do not associate mental phenomena with the activity of a substantial, independent, and enduring self or agent.

Identify the option that provides the missing phrases in the paragraphs given below:

The argument and thought-experiment now generally known as the 'Chinese Room Argument' was first published in a paper in 1980 by American philosopher John Searle. It has become one of the best-known arguments in recent philosophy.

- _____ following a computer program for responding to Chinese characters slipped under the door. Searle understands nothing of Chinese, and yet, by following the program for manipulating symbols and numerals just as a computer does, he produces appropriate strings of Chinese characters.
- _____ the narrow conclusion of the argument is that programming a digital computer may make it appear to understand language but does not produce real understanding. Hence the "Turing Test" is inadequate. Searle argues that the thought experiment underscores the fact that computers merely use syntactic rules to manipulate symbol strings, but have no understanding of meaning or semantics.
- _____ that the theory that human minds are computer-like computational or information processing systems is refuted. Instead minds must result from biological processes; computers can at best simulate these biological processes. Thus the argument has large implications for semantics, philosophy of language and mind, theories of consciousness, computer science and cognitive science generally.
- _____ there have been many critical replies to the argument.

The first five sentences of the paragraph given below are in a jumbled order. Identify the option that gives their correct order:

- Of the total vehicular pollution, 40% to 45% comes from two-wheelers and another 30% to 35% from four wheelers.
- The movement away from kerosene, coal and wood fires for cooking will have a big impact on domestic activity.
- The other area that is already critical and will keep getting worse, unless checked, is vehicular emission.
- We need to speed up the journey towards LPG and solar-powered stoves.
- Just vehicular pollution contributes around 35% of the total PM 2.5 emissions today.

In a future with internal combustion engines (ICE) vehicles, urban pollution will continue to remain 25% to 30% above safe global standards because of the growth in automobiles. This is where our focus needs to be.

Study the paragraph given below. Two sentences, other than the first one, state the same idea. It is enough if one of them is retained and the other can be dropped. Identify the pair – keep it in mind that either of them could be deleted.

- A. What is the carbon bubble and what will happen if it bursts?
- B. This carbon bubble has been estimated at between $1 trillion and $4 trillion (£3 trillion), a large chunk of the global economy's balance sheet.
- C. Investments amounting to trillions of dollars in fossil fuels – coal mines, oil wells, power stations, conventional vehicles – will lose their value when the world moves decisively to a low-carbon economy.
- D. Fossil fuel reserves and production facilities will become stranded assets, having absorbed capital but unable to be used to make a profit.
- E. Currently, fossil fuel prices do not reflect the environmental damage the fuels do, in climate change and air and water pollution.
- F. As the world moves towards a low-carbon economy, fossil fuel investments worth trillions of dollars, from oil wells to cars, will lose their value.

Identify the option that suggests a better sequencing of ideas expressed in the bulleted list, keeping in mind the proposition developed in the sentence itself:

Throughout human history the hunting and farming of meat has been part of our stories and mythologies and some of our legal and religious systems:

- 1. even the roasted wild boars consumed at the end of every adventure by Asterix and Obelix
- 2. the sacrificial sheep to mark the beginning of Eid Al-Adha
- 3. the medieval forest laws that created areas where no one but English royalty could hunt
- 4. the fatted calf for the prodigal son

Options :

- ✘ The given sequence is acceptable as it moves from comics to serious stories
- ✘ Only the statement about ‘the sacrificial sheep’ needs to be moved up as it is sacred

Reflecting the order stated, the fatted calf should be the first one, followed by the royal laws and the sacrificial sheep;
✔ Asterix and Obelix should be the last one.

- ✘ The royal practice and laws are factual and must be stated first

This refers to ‘Sanitation and state capacity’ by xxxx (Xx October 14). I couldn’t agree more with the writer on why “Swachh Bharat must go beyond building physical infrastructure”. Cooperation across departments as well as roping in civic bodies and, most importantly, citizens remain the most critical bottlenecks for many of the government’s abhiyans. Waste management must be addressed as a priority. Issues like recycling and processing domestic and commercial electronic waste, which is growing exponentially, require a more sophisticated approach than landfill dumping.

Identify the option that describes the relationship between the second and the third sentences:

The recent hype created by the media over the mauling of a visitor by a white tiger at the Delhi Zoo portrays the animal as a bloodthirsty monster ('A zoo tragedy', xx, September 24). While it is sad that a young life was lost due to the negligence of the zoo authorities, it is certainly wrong to paint an animal born and raised in captivity as an evil brute. Given the shouting and the stones being pelted on the tiger, even the calmest animal could be provoked into turning aggressive. There should be greater focus on instilling discipline among people who visit the zoo.

It is not surprising to see the continued hounding of author Perumal Murugan for exercising his fundamental right to freedom of speech and expression ('Murugan, wife apply for transfer from college to avoid book row', IE, February 4). The Indian constitution safeguards freedom of speech. So do many nations. I remember discussing this issue with a few Americans in Washington. Identify the option that specifies the defect in the following letter:

I DO not agree with the editorial, 'Take Rajasthan's cue' (Xx, September 24). Toilets and playgrounds are integral to any learning environment. It should also periodically review the pedagogy. A lower emphasis on toilets is also likely to have a negative impact on girls' education, since the lack of toilets in schools is a major reason for them dropping out. The government should address the issue of learning outcomes through a multi-pronged approach. It should raise the standard for teacher selection. The suggestion of overlooking the teacher-student ratio criteria is ironic, since that is also bound to affect learning outcomes.

Hopkins's 'Pied Beauty' is a unique example of a curtal sonnet. Explain the significance of these lines and the echo of an image by another poet.

*All things counter, original, spare, strange;
Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
With swift, slow; sweet, sour; adazzle, dim;
He fathers-forth whose beauty is past change:*

Options :

✖ Hopkins is exploring his relationship with God through experimental stress patterns, syntax and language, which is similar to Eliot's in 'The Waste Land'

✔ Hopkins, in this hymn, a paean, reinforces this notion of a changeless God divinely creating dappledness, complexity, variety and flux, similar to a kind God creating the Lamb and a punitive one, the Tyger in Blake

✖ Hopkins in these lines employs a telling alliterative rhythm – the sounds are similar, but signify contrary and different values, as early English poets used to

✖ Hopkins observes here that the whole spectrum of nature in all its beauty is mysteriously germinated by Him, who is worthy of praise and tries to imitate the tone and affect of the psalms.

Identify the correct option.

'The Road' by Soyinka depicts the Nigerian experiences during the middle of the twentieth century, and it reflects the roles played by drugs, criminals, corrupt policemen, and unscrupulous politicians. This line is from 'The Road' of Wole Soyinka: "May we never walk when the road waits, famished." Explain the significance of this line.

Options :

✘ The Professor's occupation promotes a personal quest for the meaning of death, which encounters him at the end of 'The Road'.

✔ It is a prayer to Ogun, the god of the road (in Yoruba cosmology), and not simply the road itself, that waits, hungry.

✘ It is an adage that cautions against driving on the road and advocates walking on it, instead.

✘ Soyinka's fascination with the predatory quality of the road. This beast of prey which lies in wait is "a monstrous man-eater: an inescapable doom."
