Read the passage and answer the questions that follow.

What would you be willing to give up in order to keep using your smartphone? Some say they would rather lose one of their five senses than give up their smartphone. And worryingly, some say they'd even sacrifice a finger for their phone.

A new survey by a UK-based app development agency has revealed that 23% of millennials in the UK would choose smartphones over their five senses, while 38% would give up drinking for their device. Meanwhile, 10% said they would even be willing to cut off a finger rather than give up their mobile phones.

Researchers spoke to over 500 millennials in the United Kingdom aged 18-34 for the survey. This research report also involved entertaining conversation about smartphone addiction that has been consuming various companies, adults and teens. While some argue that it's on the product and platform creators to help control our dependence on mobile devices, others say it's our own responsibility — and a good first step is knowing where you stand.

In another survey conducted by an app based phone service in the US, over 1,180 millennials aged between 18 and 34 were asked what they would be willing to give up in order to keep their smartphone privileges for a week. As it turns out, 41% of millennials said they would be willing to quit shampooing for a week.

All respondents owned a cell phone and were split almost evenly by gender using the census breakdown. In the survey, 54% of respondents said they would be willing to give up movies and TV for a month, while 28% said they would give up their pet. 23% chose their phone over caffeine, and a small 17% took the 'take my toothbrush but not my cell phone' approach.

Given the capabilities of smartphones, it isn't surprising that consumers would be willing to prioritise them more than a decade ago. But these results are an interesting look at how a generation that has lived with smartphones for most of their adult life sees their mobile devices as necessity over luxury.
