In the eighteenth century, one of the first modern economists, Adam Smith thought that the whole annual produce of the land and labour of every country provides revenue to three different orders of people; those who live by rent, those who live by wages and those who live by profit. Each successive stage of the industrial revolution, however, made the social structure more complicated. Many intermediate groups grew up during the nineteenth century, between the upper middle class and the working class. There are small scale industrialists as well as the large ones, small shopkeepers and tradesmen, officials and salaried employees, skilled and unskilled workers and professionals, such as doctors and teachers. Farmers and peasants continue in all countries as independent groups. In spite of this development, one of the most famous writers on social class in the nineteenth century, Karl Marx thought that there was tendency for society to split into huge class camps, the capitalists and the workers. Influential as Marx's theory of social class was, it was over-simplified. The social make-up of modern societies is much more complex than he suggested.
